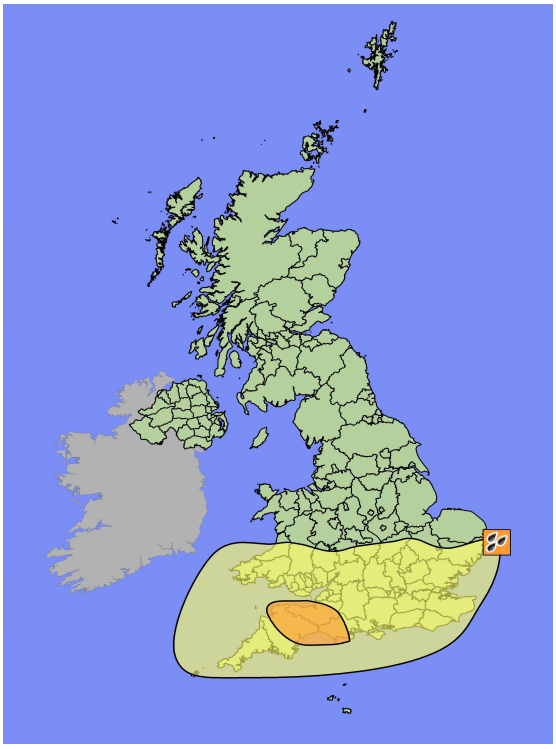
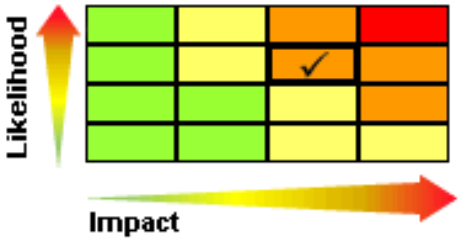
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Frontal systems moving northwestwards from the Continent are likely to bring further heavy, and possibly thundery rain by the early hours of Tuesday. This will give totals of 20-40mm in places, with isolated values in excess of 50mm also possible. There is much uncertainty regarding details, and there may be marked spatial variations in rainfall amounts.

The Met Office have issued an Amber Warning of Rain

Valid from 21:00 on Mon, 30th Apr 2012 until 15:00 on Tue, 01st May 2012

Outbreaks of rain, heavy and possibly thundery, are likely to affect southern England and the southern half of Wales, late on Monday and during Tuesday.

The public should be aware that, following recent heavy rainfall, further localised flooding is possible, with parts of Devon, Dorset and Somerset looking especially vulnerable. There will also be difficult driving conditions at times.

As we move through daylight hours on Tuesday the risk of heavy rain will gradually reduce.

In addition, strong northeasterly winds are likely across the Midlands and parts of Wales.
